Synopsis of Chapters Already Published A newspaper reporter, named Hammond, who is "down on his luck," while dining in a restaurant in New York, meets a man, nearly blind, named Paraday, who, like himself, is without sufficient funds to pay for his meal.

The embarrassment is overcome by the reporter pawning Paraday's watch, part of the proceeds of which are used to defray the cost of their dianers. The blind man then hands Hammond two letters, which he asks him to read.

One of the letters is from Esther Spotswood, daughter of Dr. Spotswood, Paraday's guardlan, whose hand has been refused by him, begging him to return to Culpepper, Miss., his home, and see her father before he dies. She states the old physician is continually calling for him.

The other letter is from the physician. He states that he wants to clear up Faraday's continually calling for him.

"In fact, I think Culpepper would feel nurt if it couldn't boast of a haunted mansion or two. And so far, for that reason, no one ha sever bothered to investigate the cause of the green light in the old Delapierre mansion.

But in the light of recent information I'm strongly inclined to the belief that my father had something of a fortune. If it is in that house; if, as Spotswood fears—or hopes, whichever it is—tho old man's spirit is keping watch over my inheritance; or if the house is merely infested with tramps who keep up the ghost theory for their owin purpose. I intend to get at the bottom of it as soon as I return.

"If there s any money concealed on the premises, it will be Tom Faraday's, and don't you forget it.

"What do you say, Mr. Hammond, sir—you've been kind and courteous to me, and I like you first rate indeed—what do you say to joining me in my ghost hunt? If there's any money, we'll whack up. And—and if there isn't, why you wou't be out anything." I knocked the ashes from my pipe and refilled it before I answered.

One thing was certain in what he said—that I wouldn't be out anything; and I had to admit that I was enormously tired of Manhattan and living on husks. The thought came to me that if I could get out of the city for a few months or so my luck might have time.

CHAPTER VIII. With a Flowing Sheet.

"It's scared me more than a little—has that same ghostly light—when I was a little fellow. But of late it has kind of dropped out of my mind; a haunted house isn't anything out of the common run of tings in a Southern village like Culpepper. One grows accustomed to the thought of it, and accepts it rather as a natural manifestation than as something of which to be fearsome.

"But the very deure of it is," he exploded sava yely, "we re both dead broke, and we've not grub enough aboard to last two days, much less a week. What to do now?"

If he looked to me for information, he was destined to get none, nor any comfort. I could only shake my head and stare blankly out at the summer sky, a section of which was framed by the companionway.

"I'd am useless," said I finally. "If I could, I'd make a touch. But it's a safe bet—which is immoral to make—that there isn't a friend of mine in the city, nor an enemy, who cares enough about me to lend me enough money to get out of town."

"I hadn't any thought of anything of the sort." rejoined Faraday with some heat.
